

The Workhorse

The Workhorse brings independence, action, and autonomy along with an action-oriented approach.

You really love a job where you get to work independently and use your hands and some sort of tools. Instead of working in a group, you like going at a problem by yourself so you can control how everything turns out. That way, you can jump right into whatever task you're presented with and figure it out by doing something. You're much less interested in sitting around thinking about how to address the situation.

Your practical-minded approach to your work can make you valuable to a team. Any project needs someone who's ready to jump in and get things done. It may be, too, that you're more quiet or low-key than some of your coworkers. This type of personality can be a welcome addition to a work-group, especially one where certain extraverts are already tending to dominate conversations and strategy sessions.

At times, group activities can feel excruciating to someone less inclined to work with people or discuss and strategize about an issue. Just keep reminding yourself that your independent, can-do approach might be even more effective if you combined it with the forethought and insight of those you work with.